Rajaji Wants More Freedom for Legislators

Sixty-seven years ago, our club hosted a thought-provoking discussion on how our Parliament should function. The following is a report on that meeting, which was featured in The Rotary International.

Addressing a meeting of the Madras Rotary Club on December 17, at which the U. S. Senator, Mr. Wayne Morse, was the guest speaker, Mr. C. Rajagopalachari referred to the difference between the American System of Parliamentary Government and that of India and Britain. In America, differences of opinion expressed in the House of Representatives do not cause any instability in the government. Here in India, they had to stand by the pledge they had given to the Party to which they belonged and on the strength of which the party held office.

Mr. Rajagopalachari expressed his personal view that the Congress party would continue to govern India until the next elections and would likely remain in office beyond that period. Practically, it was irremovable. That being the case, there should be less disciplinary entanglement in the parliamentary work of members representing the Congress, who should be free to exercise their independent judgment and give their votes.

"Let more ventilation be allowed in the Parliamentary Hall and good breeze allowed to blow in," Mr. Rajagopalachari stated that if the proposal could not be accepted as a constitutional amendment, it could instead be adopted as a convention.
