ROTARY NEWS

Finding family in France
Rotary Youth Exchange alum Athena
Trentin shares her advice for young travelers

By JP Swenson

Athena Trentin had a boring childhood — at least, according to her. She grew up in

Escanaba, Michigan, a port city in the Upper Peninsula with a population of 14,000 at the time. “Most people were expected to grow up and graduate from high school, work for the paper mill, work in the skilled trades,” Trentin says. “My parents never really gave me any other option than to go to college and see the world, become who I want to be.”

When Trentin was in junior high, her mom became active in recapturing her family's Indigenous identity and helped create a community center for Native Americans living in Escanaba, which was 20 miles from the closest reservation. But there was pushback from members of the City Council, and Trentin says she was retaliated against at school. This first encounter with racism sparked a realization in her. “There's a world out there, and I wanted to see it,” she says. “I belonged somewhere I could meet people from everywhere.”

Athena Trentin's experience as a Rotary Youth Exchange student showed her “what life could be.” “It was the most amazing year of my life,” she says.

She found out about Rotary Youth Exchange and wanted to participate but was too young to meet the age requirement. Trentin felt stuck and that feeling compounded the following year when her family couldn't afford the trip amid her parents' divorce. The Rotary Youth Exchange representative in her town came back to her family and said, “She is the person we want to send.” Trentin didn't let it go.

She got a job at a fast food restaurant to help pay the travel costs not covered through the program. She received a grant from United Way to host her own international summit. She invited exchange students from various organizations in the Upper Peninsula to Escanaba to discuss their perceptions of the United States and their views of the world.

She remembers thinking, “If we can exchange this information, imagine what we could do to change the world.” United Way sent her to a national leadership conference at Indiana University. “That's probably the first time I had ever been out of Wisconsin and Michigan — the first time I ever met people of color other than American Indians.” She needed more experiences like that one. And the summer after her junior year, Rotary Youth Exchange sent her to France.
