EDITORIAL

Water is life, and clean water means health.

Audrey Hepburn

“A drop of water is a grain of gold” for the people of Karakum desert in Turkmenistan. Water is one of the most essential natural resources for life on earth. The well-being of human being depends on clean drinking water, proper sanitation and hygiene. Clean water and sanitation are interconnected. Poor sanitation contaminates the drinking water which leads to cholera, diarrhea and all waterborne diseases. Especially children get more affected which reduces the school attendance and increases the mortality rate. Waste water treatment and waste disposal are required for the sustainable sanitation. These treatments also prevent pollution of rivers and other bodies.

These are necessary for a sustainable growth and well-being of communities. The government, organisations, and communities must work together to ensure access to clean water and proper sanitation by investing in water treatment plants, proper sewerage system, and educating people on hygiene.
