Chai - Pe - Charcha.*

EDITORIAL

On Independence Day, as the tricolor flutters proudly in the sky, one of the most cherished rituals for many Indians is enjoying a cup of chai with friends, family, or even strangers. The concept of Chai Pe Charcha (discussion over tea) is more than just a casual chat—it's an opportunity to reflect on the progress of the nation, discuss the freedoms we enjoy, and appreciate the sacrifices that made them possible.

The simple act of sharing tea becomes a symbol of connection. It transcends barriers of age, background, and ideology. In small towns and bustling cities alike, people gather around steaming cups of chai, exchanging ideas about the country's achievements and challenges. The conversations often touch upon national unity, economic growth, social progress, and even the road ahead.

On this day, chai doesn't just fuel the body; it nourishes the spirit of democracy, where every voice matters. It's a time to discuss how far we've come since 1947 and to imagine where we want to go as a nation. Whether in a humble roadside stall or a cozy living room, Chai Pe Charcha embodies the essence of Independence Day—freedom, unity, and the collective desire to shape a better future.

GUESS THE FREEDOM FIGHTERS:-

In 1857, I began my revolt,
With sparks of fire, the revolution jolted,
A soldier, a queen, they led the way,
Who am I, who fought to stay?

I was the man of steel,
strong and true,
Who united the land with courage anew,
I took no rest, nor any pause,
Who am I, who gave India its laws?

I wore khadi with dignity and grace,
I stood for truth, in every place,
I led a nation, once bound in chains,
Who am I, who broke those reins?

I stood against the British, strong and tall,
Fighting for a land that belongs to all,
Though young in age, I had a heart of fire,
Who am I, who sparked a nation's desire?

I fought for the nation, with my pen as a sword,
My writings brought hope, my words never bored,
A poet, a dreamer, my voice was loud,
Who am I, who made the nation proud?
